Terre-mère:

une figure mythique enracinée dans l'imaginaire national du cinéma québécois

In French with simultaneous English translation

Cette présentation porte sur les moments de l'émergence, de réactualisation, de déplacement et de résurgence de la figure de la Terre-mère dans le cinéma québécois de 1940 à aujourd'hui. J'entends examiner les potentiels théoriques et retombées concrètes de l'approche des « gender and nation », théorie ayant fourni le concept opératoire de la figure de la femme-nation, par le biais d'une étude du cinéma québécois. Son passé sociopolitique, les liens étroits entre ses objets culturels et son processus identitaire ainsi que les tiraillements entre mouvements féministe et nationaliste, font du Québec un exemple idéal à l'introduction de la figure de la Terre-mère dans l'étude d'un cinéma national. Le moment d'émergence (Un homme et son péché (Paul Gury, 1949)), la réactualisation (Valérie (Denis Héroux, 1968)), le déplacement (Q-bec my love (Jean-Pierre Lefebvre, 1969)), et la résurgence (Mariages (Catherine Martin, 2001) et À l'origine d'un cri (Robin Aubert, 2010)) de la figure de la Terre-mère semblent permettre d'interroger l'évolution du lien entre identité féminine et imaginaire national.

Julie Ravary est doctorante à l'Université de Montréal. Son projet de thèse traite des liens entre identités genrées féminines et identités nationales dans le cinéma québécois. Ses intérêts de recherche portent sur le cinéma québécois, le cinéma argentin, le cinéma des femmes, les théories des cinémas nationaux ainsi que les théories « gender » au cinéma.

*Mother Earth:
A Mythical Figure Rooted in the National Imagination of Quebecois Cinema*

This presentation focuses on four key periods – emergence, renewal, displacement, and revival – of the Mother Earth figure in Quebecois cinema from 1940 to the present day. I intend to examine the theoretical possibilities and concrete implications of the « gender and nation » approach, a theory that has informed the underlying concept of the image of « woman-nation », through a study of Quebecois cinema. Its socio-political past, direct linkages between its cultural objects and identity development process as well as tensions between the feminist and nationalist movements make Quebec an ideal example through which to introduce the image of Mother Earth in the study of a national cinema. The moment of emergence (Un homme et son péché (Paul Gury, 1949)), the renewal (Valérie (Denis Héroux, 1968)), the displacement (Q-bec my love (Jean-Pierre Lefebvre, 1969)), and the revival (Mariages (Catherine Martin, 2001) et À l'origine d'un cri (Robin Aubert, 2010)) of the Mother Earth figure allow us to examine the evolution of the link between feminine identity and national imagination.

Julie Ravary is a doctoral candidate at the University of Montreal. Her thesis project examines the links between feminine identities and national identities in Quebecois cinema. Her research interests focus on Quebecois cinema, Argentinian cinema, women's cinema, theories of national cinemas, as well as theories of gender in cinema.

Loretta Todd (Cree Writer and Filmmaker)

"Can I know Canada by its stories?"

As an Indigenous filmmaker, I wonder about the stories Canadian filmmakers and TV and digital producers tell. What do I learn about Canada when I watch their screens and the parade of their stories? Who are these people and where did they come from? In this presentation, I explore key threads I see emanating from Canadian screens, from an Indigenous perspective. This isn't reverse ethnography, though I am looking at material culture and engaging in some mapping of a structural analysis of Canadian narrative. Instead, I want to immerse myself in the metaphor or lack of metaphor that flows through the stories of Canada by Canadians – and understand the origin stories of what is Canada and who is Canadian. And if there is no origin story, what does that say about Canadians and Canadian filmmakers?

Specifically I will explore key films/narratives: Stories We Tell, by Sarah Polly. How can you not admire Sarah Polly? She famously denounced her privilege by quitting high school to dedicate herself to class struggle. In Stories We Tell, she searches her own origin story but I wonder: is she the poster child for post-structuralists everywhere? Souvenir of Canada, by Robin Neinstein (based on the book by Douglas Coupland): While Coupland wears his Canadian heart on his sleeve – he is also casting himself as the New Native – the materia prima of the true north strong and free. And I'm not just saying that because I'm Native – though we seemed to have been thought to death in this neo-ethnography of Canada. The presentation shall also make reference to various Canadian digital screens, including vice.com.

Loretta Todd: Female. Cree. Metis. White.

In demand as a writer and lecturer on arts and media, Ms. Todd spoke at the International Day of the World's Indigenous Peoples at the United Nations, as well as other prestigious institutions, including Museum of Modern Art, Museum of the American Indian, World Cultures Department of UCLA and numerous conferences. Her essays appear in many publications from MIT Press to UBC Press. Two of her recent publications include: About the Future (published in Close Encounters: The Next 500 Years, by Plug In Institute of Contemporary Art). And she provided the afterward for Bill Reid and Beyond: Expanding on Modern Native Art.

Loretta is a scriptwriter (Sundance Writer's Lab) and director, whose work includes award-winning documentaries, such as Forgotten Warriors, primarily with the NFB of Canada, as well as experimental work and television. She created, produced and directed Tansi! Nehiyawetan, a Cree children's series on APTN. And, she created MyCree, a Cree language-learning app, free in the App Store with over 9000 downloads. Currently she is in production with Coyote's Crazy Smart Science, a new children's series about Indigenous science, and has two feature films in development. She also produced, directed and wrote the pilot for Skye and Chang, a sci-fi, martial arts mash-up broadcast on APTN. And she is about to go into production with Fierce Girls, a transmedia project about superheroes – a co-production with New Zealand.

« Peut-on connaître le Canada par ses histoires ? »

À titre de cinéaste autochtone, je m'interroge sur les histoires que les cinéastes canadiens, et les producteurs de télévision et de contenu numérique racontent. Qu'est-ce que j'apprends au sujet du Canada quand je regarde leurs projections et le défilé de leurs narrations? Qui sont ces personnes et d'où viennent-elles? Dans cette présentation, j'explore les éléments principaux que je perçois d'un point de vue autochtone sur les écrans du cinéma canadien. Ceci n'est pas de l'ethnographie inversée, bien que j'examine la culture matérielle et que j'engage dans la configuration d'une analyse structurelle du cinéma narratif canadien. Par contre, je veux explorer les métaphores, ou le manque de métaphores, qui parcourent à travers les histoires du Canada racontées par les Canadiens – et je veux comprendre les origines des histoires qui décrivent l'identité du Canada et des Canadiens. Et s'il n'y a pas d'origines, qu'est-ce que ceci nous dit à propos des Canadiens et des cinéastes canadiens ?

Plus précisément, j'examinerai des éléments clés/cinématographiques: Stories We Tell, par Sarah Polley. Comment ne pouvez-vous pas admirer Sarah Polley ? Elle est connue pour avoir dénoncé son privilège en quittant l'école secondaire et pour se consacrer à la lutte de classes. Dans Stories We Tell, elle cherche la propre histoire de ses origines, mais je me demande : est-elle vraiment l'exemple idéale pour les post structuralistes? Souvenir of Canada, par Robin Neinstein (fondé sur le livre de Douglas Coupland): Bien que Coupland a le cœur canadien sur la main – il se décrit aussi en étant le Nouveau Indigène – la materia prima du nord véritable, libre et puissant. Et je ne dis pas ceci seulement parce que je suis autochtone – bien que nous semblions avoir été discuté à mort dans cette néo-ethnographie du Canada. Cette présentation fera aussi référence à plusieurs projections numériques canadiennes, y compris Vice.com.

Loretta Todd : Femme. Crie. Métis. Blanche.

Recherchée en tant qu'écrivaine et conférencière dans le domaine des arts et média, Mme Todd a présenté un discours lors de la Journée Internationale des Peuples Autochtones aux Nations Unies, ainsi qu'à d'autres institutions prestigieuses, incluant le Museum of Modern Art, National Museum of the American Indian, UCLA Department of World Arts and Cultures/Dance et de nombreuses conférences. Ses articles ont parus dans plusieurs publications, tels que MIT Press et UBC Press. Parmi ses publications récentes: About the Future (publié dans Close Encounters: The Next 500 Years, par Plug In Institute of Contemporary Art). Elle a aussi fourni la postface pour Bill Reid and Beyond: Expanding on Modern Native Art.

Loretta est une scénariste (Sundance Writer's Lab) et réalisatrice. Son travail inclus des documentaires qui ont reçus de nombreux prix, tels que Forgotten Warriors, majoritairement avec l'Office national du film du Canada (ONF), ainsi que la télévision et des travaux expérimentaux. Elle a créé, produit et réalisé Tansi! Nehiyawetan, une série pour enfants cris pour l'APTN. Elle a aussi créé MyCree, une application pour apprendre la langue crie, gratuit dans l'App Store avec plus de 9000 téléchargements. Elle est actuellement en production avec Coyote's Crazy Smart Science, une nouvelle série pour enfants sur la science autochtone, et elle a deux longs métrages en développement. Elle a aussi produit, réalisé et écrit le pilote pour Skye and Chang, une diffusion inspirée de science-fiction et d'arts martiaux sur APTN. Finalement, elle est sur le point de passer en production avec Fierce Girls, un projet transmédia sur les superhéros – une coproduction avec la Nouvelle-Zélande.
